SECURITY TIPS

USB-CONNECTED DEVICES

Planning to travel soon? If your device is running low, be aware that charging (juicing) your electronic device at free USB charging stations, such as those found in airports, hotel lobbies, might have consequences. You could become a victim of "juice jacking."

What is Juice Jacking?

Juice Jacking refers to the threat of malicious access gained to your phone or other USB devices when plugged into a public charging station. Corrupted USB port can lock a device or export personal information and passwords directly to the perpetrator.

Several mobile device manufacturers have updated their devices to ask users if they want to connect their devices before any data transfers take place. Declining to connect prevents data transfer from occurring.

There is also "video jacking," which is when a malicious actor gains control of the screen on a phone or tablet to record and mirror its screen when plugged in for a charge to a corrupted connector.

Here are some tips to guard against "juice jacking:"

- Avoid using a public USB charging station. Using AC power outlets can help you avoid any potential risks, so be sure to pack AC, car chargers, and your own USB cables with you when traveling.
- If you plug your device into a public USB port and a prompt asks you to select "share data," or "trust this computer," always select "charge only."
- Carry a portable charger or external battery.
- Avoid using free USB cables given away as a promotional item, found in public spaces, or sent to you unsolicited.
