Security Tips

Rise of Robotexts

Scammers will always look for a way into your life, whether it's through the mail, via computer, or on your phones and tablets. All you can do is stay informed and remain vigilant.

Consumer complaints about unwanted texts have nearly tripled since 2019 and some independent reports estimate the number of monthly robotexts in the billions. Some are spam, but many of them are scams, and they arrive in various forms, usually trying to alarm you about undelivered packages, problems with bank account, credit cards, and even medical insurance. Most is designed to retrieve personal information, while some might be more directly after your money.

To protect yourself, be on the lookout for texts that come from strange numbers, misspellings of words, and messages with incomplete information. Stay clear of any text with web links you didn't ask for or aren't expecting.

If you believe you've received a suspicious text, here are some recommended steps you can take:

- Verify any unknown number
  - Do not respond — even if the message offers you the ability to opt-out by texting “STOP”
  - Do not click on any links embedded in the text
  - Do not provide any information via text
  - Review your phone's built-in text-blocking settings
  - Update any phone, tablet, or smartwatch with the latest operating system and security applications
- Delete all suspicious texts
